The Fayetteville Observer
THE FAYETTEVILLE TIMES
Saturday Morning, July 4, 1987

Local-State

Section B

Larry Cheek

Patrick

How did it happen? Why did Patrick go bad? Maybe it began when Lelia Hansard got pregnant during her senior year in high school in South Carolina. Her son was born in November of 1967. She graduated the next May.

Lelia didn't marry Patrick's father, and raised the boy by herself. It wasn't until he was 13 that she married Henry Hansard, giving Patrick a father figure in his life.

Of course, he didn't act much like he wanted one.

"He'd say, 'You didn't marry my dad,' " said Mrs. Hansard. "I would tell him that made him no less a person. When I got married in 1981, he told me he wasn't going to change his name like I was doing."

By the time Henry Hansard came along, Patrick was hard to handle. He'd been causing trouble in school since the second grade. Her mother and father would interfere when she tried to discipline the child, according to Mrs. Hansard, and Patrick also became accustomed to getting what he wanted.

"I lived with my grandparents next door to my parents," she said. "When I would spank my son — not that hard — he would scream and my parents would come rushing over. They'd choose his side."

Down A One-Way Road

Patrick bounced from regular classes to special education and back again. He'd do well in special ed because he was ashamed to be there, and poorly in the mainstream classroom because he wouldn't work.

His real father, whom Patrick hasn't seen since 1974, "totally rejected him," says Mrs. Hansard. "He seldom called or wrote Patrick and when he did, he'd lie to him."

In January of 1982 the Hansard family, all three of them, went to Europe where Henry Hansard, a soldier, was to be stationed. In February Patrick was back in the States, with his grandparents in South Carolina.

One incident in Germany particularly worried Patrick's step-father. After a dispute, young Patrick threw a whiskey bottle through the driver's window of Henry Hansard's car.

"He must have thought I was sitting there," said Hansard. "No telling what would have happened if I had been. I made arrangements for him to come back to the States. I told her then he was heading down a one-way road."

Prison At 17

The problems continued for Patrick. He was caught with marijuana. He drank beer in school.

In June of 1984 the Hansards returned to North Carolina. They asked Patrick if he would like to come live with them. He said no.

In August of that year he was caught shoplifting.

In November he was expelled from school.

And that same month he broke into the deputy warden's house at the women's correctional institute near Columbia, S.C. and stole her purse.

In March of 1985 Patrick got his first taste of prsion. It was only a youthful offender's camp. He stayed there six months. He was 17 years old.

Henry Hansard's next duty station was Japan. His mother wanted to take Patrick with them, but friends said she'd better not. They had stiff laws in Japan.

Patrick went to live with his aunt when he got out of the youthful offender prison. But she started missing jewelry, including her wedding ring, and he was forced to move out.

He bounced from one fast food place to another, never keeping a job for very long. The Hansards came home in October of 1986 and on Halloween of that year, Lelia Hansard received a telephone call.

Her son had been arrested.

She's A Victim, Too

He and two young men and a woman were living together in an apartment complex. They'd have somebody over for a party and while the person was there Patrick would sneak out and rob their house.

It was a clever scheme. But it didn't keep young Patrick from getting caught.

For the crime, Patrick received a 10-year prison sentence. He'll probably be out in a little under four years and while she waits for that day, Lelia Hansard wonders what went wrong.

"He's told me he thought he had a good home life," she said. "He had everything but a father. But I don't believe this would have turned out different if he'd had one, if I'd married when he was born and we'd have been a regular family."

Patrick's stepfather says he wasn't disciplined properly when he was growing up, and that he was allowed to get away with using people.

Lelia Hansard called me after reading my series on murderers of law enforcement officers who are currently serving time in North Carolina prisons. She wanted me to know that the families of people who commit crimes are victims, too.

"I worry," she says, "but not as bad as when he first went to prison. I'm 38. He's 19. I can't let this boy tear me up. I've hardened with him. But I care. He says he's not going to do it again. But he doesn't sound convincing."

"He can't stay out on the street more than 12 months," said Hansard. "Once he gets out, he'll see what he thinks is an easy way to make money. He's

See CHEEK, Page 2-B

Aphids Take Chaw Out Of Tobacco Profits

Farming

By Tim Bass

Tobacco farmers in the Cape Fear Region are seeing red.

It's the return of the red variety of the green peach aphid, the latest critter eating at the farmer's fields and profits.

"A large percentage of (tobacco fields) have some aphids of some sort in them," said Curtis Barwick, extension tobacco specialist in Bladen County. "Just about any field you go in has some."

About 75 percent of Bladen County's tobacco fields have "some level of infestation," he said.

Extension officials describe the aphid as an insect the size of a pinhead that feeds off the underside of tender upper stalk leaves of young tobacco plants.

Green peach aphids are common in tobacco fields, but this is the second year that the red variety has invaded North Carolina's leaf crop, and officials said the problem is statewide.

"It's pretty widespread, and there have been reports from most counties — particularly in eastern North Carolina," said David Smith, extension tobacco specialist in Raleigh.

Barwick said the red variety aphid is a concern to tobacco farmers because it tolerates heat better and reproduces faster than the green variety. The red variety also appears to be resistant to some insecticides, he said.

"They're a little harder to control and are giving some farmers some problems," he said.

Aphids usually are first seen in mid-June, about the time tobacco starts to "flower," or sprout its blossom top, Barwick said.

Their feeding does not cut into tobacco yield but does affect quality, he said. Aphids secrete a "honey-dew residue" that falls on leaves. With moisture, the residue creates a mold that covers leaf pores, cutting off

See FARMING, Page 2-B

Observer-Times Photo By MARCUS CASTRO

Hopping Help

Seven-year-old Philip Glazier gets a hand from Emlyn Carter, left, and Becky Burleigh as he tries to clear a line of bodies in a leap-frog competition. The scene was during Methodist College All Sports activities on Friday.

Jurors Delay Huff Sentence With Mix-Up

By JOHN BRAY
Saturday Staff Writer

Jurors deciding whether to sentence convicted murderer Everett Randolph Huff to life imprisonment or death announced an erroneous verdict Friday in Cumberland County Superior Court and were asked to continue deliberations.

HUFF

The 28-year-old Huff was convicted Wednesday of two counts of first-degree murder in the 1984 deaths of his 9-month-old son, Crigger, and his mother-in-law. He had pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity to charges of burying alive his son and shooting 46-year-old Gail Alderson Strickland.

Jurors, scheduled to resume deliberating Monday at 10 a.m., presented the verdicts at 3:50 p.m. after two hours and five minutes of deliberations.

But after the court clerk read aloud the verdict indicating a unanimous decision for a life sentence in Mrs. Strickland's death, the jury foreman reported the decision had not been unanimous as required.

"It was our understanding that if it was not a unanimous decision for death, the alternative would be life," jury foreman Kerman A. Russ said.

But Judge Coy E. Brewer Jr. told jurors they must be unanimous in their decision. Without a unanimous decision, the court is required to impose a life sentence.

Jurors returned to the jury room and deliberated for 40 minutes before Brewer recessed court for the weekend.

Assistant Public Defender John

See HUFF, Page 2-B

School-Construction Bill Backed In House

The Legislature

RALEIGH (AP) — House Democrats gave an overwhelming vote of confidence Friday to their leadership's $830 million school financing package, rejecting Republican protests that Gov. Jim Martin's proposed bond issue was a better approach.

JORDAN

MARTIN

The House tentatively approved the bill 77-27. It would raise business taxes by more than $1 billion over 10 years and abolish the inventory tax while creating two trust funds to pay for public school construction and maintenance across the state.

A final House vote is scheduled Monday. If it passes, the package will go to the Senate, where Lt. Gov. Bob Jordan and his allies stand ready to give it quick approval.

The House action came moments after Martin, who withheld judgment on the compromise bill after Jordan and House Speaker Liston Ramsey unveiled it Thursday, issued a statement saying he could not support it.

"If the leaders of the General Assembly insist upon a modest program based on an unnecessary tax increase on business, they have the votes to do that without my support," Martin said, complaining that the Democratic plan "trivializes a large problem."

Martin has called for a $1.5 billion bond issue to create a revenue pool from which counties could borrow to build schools.

Jordan, who is expected to

See ASSEMBLY, Page 2-B

Condition Of 2 Survivors Of Crash 'Very Serious'

By ELLEN SCARBOROUGH
Saturday Staff Writer

Two survivors of Wednesday's fiery crash of an Air Force airplane remained in "very serious condition" Friday as plans continued for memorial services for five servicemen who died when the plane went down during a demonstration at Fort Bragg, authorities said.

Meanwhile, an investigative board led by an unidentified colonel assembled at Pope Air Force for the grim task of piecing together information that could shed light on why the C-130 Hercules transport plane struck the ground and burst into flames as its six-man crew attempted a low-altitude maneuver designed to deliver heavy military equipment without landing.

The crash occurred before more than 4,000 stunned spectators at the Sicily Drop Zone.

Sgt. Robert Fortenberry, an Air Force spokesman at Pope, said identities of the colonel, two majors and two captains who are on the investigative team will not be released to protect them from undue pressure.

"They come from different units from the Military Airlift Command," he said. "We are not releasing their names because the investigation is for official use only."

Fortenberry said the five-person team

See CRASH, Page 2-B

Region Residents Help Bear Olympic Flame

By MADELYN ROSENBERG
Saturday Staff Writer

The Olympic Torch made its way into Cumberland County on Friday, and spectators stood along roadsides for hours waiting for it to pass.

The torch run, scheduled to cover 2,800 miles in 26 days through 400 communities, is part of a celebration for the N.C. Olympic Festival to be held July 13-26.

Impatient children kept a close eye on the intersection of U.S. 401 and N.C. 217 where they would see the torch pass from Harnett County, almost two hours behind schedule, into Cumberland County.

Billy Wade, 31, of Harnett County passed the torch over the line to Bob Boeder, president of the Fayetteville Area Runners Association.

Deborah Miller of Fayetteville was watching when it happened.

"My wife is a fish for everything patriotic," her husband, Jack Miller, said.

Mrs. Miller took her husband and 3-year-old son to the county line at 10 a.m. and planned to follow the torch through Cumberland County.

"I've been out here for two hours, but it's worth the wait," she said.

Boeder said he enjoyed participating in the run. Boeder was accompanied by his two children for part of a designated mile run.

"I was looking foward to carrying it," Steve Boeder, 9, said.

His sister, 7-year-old Tisa, also was allowed to carry the torch part of the way.

About 150 volunteers carried the torch in Cumberland County, Tony Britt, a U.S. Olympic Festival representative, said.

Fayetteville Mayor Bill Hurley was one of the volunteer runners. He carried the torch around the Market House in downtown Fayetteville, where the Olde Fayetteville Association sponsored a celebration. About 500 people greeted the the flame's arrival.

"It's quite an honor to be a part of this," Hurley said during the half-hour ceremony.

Some sadness mingled with the joy of the occasion, as the mayor asked for a moment of silence to remember five servicemen killed in Wednesday's crash of a C-130 transport plane at Fort Bragg.

The torch ceremony continued as the 82nd Airborne Division band played and the fitness bears,

The torch ceremony continued as the 82nd Airborne Division band played and the fitness bears, mascots for the Festival, entertained onlookers.

A Festival representative presented Hurley with a souvenir torch.

Phil Clark, a catcher for the Fayetteville Generals baseball team, was the next to take the torch, sharing the honor with Samantha Fetters, Miss Fayetteville Dogwood, as the runners left the ceremony for Lumberton.

Jon Jordan, 26, from East Carolina University and

See TORCH, Page 2-B

The Fayetteville Observer
THE FAYETTEVILLE TIMES
Saturday Morning, July 4, 1987

Local-State

Section B

Larry Cheek

Patrick

How did it happen? Why did Patrick go bad? Maybe it began when Lelia Hansard got pregnant during her senior year in high school in South Carolina. Her son was born in November of 1967. She graduated the next May.

Lelia didn't marry Patrick's father, and raised the boy by herself. It wasn't until he was 13 that she married Henry Hansard, giving Patrick a father figure in his life.

Of course, he didn't act much like he wanted one.

"He'd say, 'You didn't marry my dad,' " said Mrs. Hansard. "I would tell him that made him no less a person. When I got married in 1981, he told me he wasn't going to change his name like I was doing."

By the time Henry Hansard came along, Patrick was hard to handle. He'd been causing trouble in school since the second grade. Her mother and father would interfere when she tried to discipline the child, according to Mrs. Hansard, and Patrick also became accustomed to getting what he wanted.

"I lived with my grandparents next door to my parents," she said. "When I would spank my son — not that hard — he would scream and my parents would come rushing over. They'd choose his side."

Down A One-Way Road

Patrick bounced from regular classes to special education and back again. He'd do well in special ed because he was ashamed to be there, and poorly in the mainstream classroom because he wouldn't work.

His real father, whom Patrick hasn't seen since 1974, "totally rejected him," says Mrs. Hansard. "He seldom called or wrote Patrick and when he did, he'd lie to him."

In January of 1982 the Hansard family, all three of them, went to Europe where Henry Hansard, a soldier, was to be stationed. In February Patrick was back in the States, with his grandparents in South Carolina.

One incident in Germany particularly worried Patrick's step-father. After a dispute, young Patrick threw a whiskey bottle through the driver's window of Henry Hansard's car.

"He must have thought I was sitting there," said Hansard. "No telling what would have happened if I had been. I made arrangements for him to come back to the States. I told her then he was heading down a one-way road."

Prison At 17

The problems continued for Patrick. He was caught with marijuana. He drank beer in school.

In June of 1984 the Hansards returned to North Carolina. They asked Patrick if he would like to come live with them. He said no.

In August of that year he was caught shoplifting.

In November he was expelled from school.

And that same month he broke into the deputy warden's house at the women's correctional institute near Columbia, S.C. and stole her purse.

In March of 1985 Patrick got his first taste of prsion. It was only a youthful offender's camp. He stayed there six months. He was 17 years old.

Henry Hansard's next duty station was Japan. His mother wanted to take Patrick with them, but friends said she'd better not. They had stiff laws in Japan.

Patrick went to live with his aunt when he got out of the youthful offender prison. But she started missing jewelry, including her wedding ring, and he was forced to move out.

He bounced from one fast food place to another, never keeping a job for very long. The Hansards came home in October of 1986 and on Halloween of that year, Lelia Hansard received a telephone call.

Her son had been arrested.

She's A Victim, Too

He and two young men and a woman were living together in an apartment complex. They'd have somebody over for a party and while the person was there Patrick would sneak out and rob their house.

It was a clever scheme. But it didn't keep young Patrick from getting caught.

For the crime, Patrick received a 10-year prison sentence. He'll probably be out in a little under four years and while she waits for that day, Lelia Hansard wonders what went wrong.

"He's told me he thought he had a good home life," she said. "He had everything but a father. But I don't believe this would have turned out different if he'd had one, if I'd married when he was born and we'd have been a regular family."

Patrick's stepfather says he wasn't disciplined properly when he was growing up, and that he was allowed to get away with using people.

Lelia Hansard called me after reading my series on murderers of law enforcement officers who are currently serving time in North Carolina prisons. She wanted me to know that the families of people who commit crimes are victims, too.

"I worry," she says, "but not as bad as when he first went to prison. I'm 38. He's 19. I can't let this boy tear me up. I've hardened with him. But I care. He says he's not going to do it again. But he doesn't sound convincing."

"He can't stay out on the street more than 12 months," said Hansard. "Once he gets out, he'll see what he thinks is an easy way to make money. He's

See CHEEK, Page 2-B

Aphids Take Chaw Out Of Tobacco Profits

Farming

By Tim Bass

Tobacco farmers in the Cape Fear Region are seeing red.

It's the return of the red variety of the green peach aphid, the latest critter eating at the farmer's fields and profits.

"A large percentage of (tobacco fields) have some aphids of some sort in them," said Curtis Barwick, extension tobacco specialist in Bladen County. "Just about any field you go in has some."

About 75 percent of Bladen County's tobacco fields have "some level of infestation," he said.

Extension officials describe the aphid as an insect the size of a pinhead that feeds off the underside of tender upper stalk leaves of young tobacco plants.

Green peach aphids are common in tobacco fields, but this is the second year that the red variety has invaded North Carolina's leaf crop, and officials said the problem is statewide.

"It's pretty widespread, and there have been reports from most counties — particularly in eastern North Carolina," said David Smith, extension tobacco specialist in Raleigh.

Barwick said the red variety aphid is a concern to tobacco farmers because it tolerates heat better and reproduces faster than the green variety. The red variety also appears to be resistant to some insecticides, he said.

"They're a little harder to control and are giving some farmers some problems," he said.

Aphids usually are first seen in mid-June, about the time tobacco starts to "flower," or sprout its blossom top, Barwick said.

Their feeding does not cut into tobacco yield but does affect quality, he said. Aphids secrete a "honey-dew residue" that falls on leaves. With moisture, the residue creates a mold that covers leaf pores, cutting off

See FARMING, Page 2-B

Observer-Times Photo By MARCUS CASTRO

Hopping Help

Seven-year-old Philip Glazier gets a hand from Emlyn Carter, left, and Becky Burleigh as he tries to clear a line of bodies in a leap-frog competition. The scene was during Methodist College All Sports activities on Friday.

Jurors Delay Huff Sentence With Mix-Up

By JOHN BRAY
Saturday Staff Writer

Jurors deciding whether to sentence convicted murderer Everett Randolph Huff to life imprisonment or death announced an erroneous verdict Friday in Cumberland County Superior Court and were asked to continue deliberations.

HUFF

The 28-year-old Huff was convicted Wednesday of two counts of first-degree murder in the 1984 deaths of his 9-month-old son, Crigger, and his mother-in-law. He had pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity to charges of burying alive his son and shooting 46-year-old Gail Alderson Strickland.

Jurors, scheduled to resume deliberating Monday at 10 a.m., presented the verdicts at 3:50 p.m. after two hours and five minutes of deliberations.

But after the court clerk read aloud the verdict indicating a unanimous decision for a life sentence in Mrs. Strickland's death, the jury foreman reported the decision had not been unanimous as required.

"It was our understanding that if it was not a unanimous decision for death, the alternative would be life," jury foreman Kerman A. Russ said.

But Judge Coy E. Brewer Jr. told jurors they must be unanimous in their decision. Without a unanimous decision, the court is required to impose a life sentence.

Jurors returned to the jury room and deliberated for 40 minutes before Brewer recessed court for the weekend.

Assistant Public Defender John

See HUFF, Page 2-B

School-Construction Bill Backed In House

The Legislature

RALEIGH (AP) — House Democrats gave an overwhelming vote of confidence Friday to their leadership's $830 million school financing package, rejecting Republican protests that Gov. Jim Martin's proposed bond issue was a better approach.

JORDAN

The House tentatively approved the bill 77-27. It would raise business taxes by more than $1 billion over 10 years and abolish the inventory tax while creating two trust funds to pay for public school construction and maintenance across the state.

MARTIN

A final House vote is scheduled Monday. If it passes, the package will go to the Senate, where Lt. Gov. Bob Jordan and his allies stand ready to give it quick approval.

The House action came moments after Martin, who withheld judgment on the compromise bill after Jordan and House Speaker Liston Ramsey unveiled it Thursday, issued a statement saying he could not support it.

"If the leaders of the General Assembly insist upon a modest program based on an unnecessary tax increase on business, they have the votes to do that without my support," Martin said, complaining that the Democratic plan "trivializes a large problem."

Martin has called for a $1.5 billion bond issue to create a revenue pool from which counties could borrow to build schools.

Jordan, who is expected to

See ASSEMBLY, Page 2-B

Condition Of 2 Survivors Of Crash 'Very Serious'

By ELLEN SCARBOROUGH
Saturday Staff Writer

Two survivors of Wednesday's fiery crash of an Air Force airplane remained in "very serious condition" Friday as plans continued for memorial services for five servicemen who died when the plane went down during a demonstration at Fort Bragg, authorities said.

Meanwhile, an investigative board led by an unidentified colonel assembled at Pope Air Force for the grim task of piecing together information that could shed light on why the C-130 Hercules transport plane struck the ground and burst into flames as its six-man crew attempted a low-altitude maneuver designed to deliver heavy military equipment without landing.

The crash occurred before more than 4,000 stunned spectators at the Sicily Drop Zone.

Sgt. Robert Fortenberry, an Air Force spokesman at Pope, said identities of the colonel, two majors and two captains who are on the investigative team will not be released to protect them from undue pressure.

"They come from different units from the Military Airlift Command," he said. "We are not releasing their names because the investigation is for official use only."

Fortenberry said the five-person team

See CRASH, Page 2-B

Region Residents Help Bear Olympic Flame

By MADELYN ROSENBERG
Saturday Staff Writer

The Olympic Torch made its way into Cumberland County on Friday, and spectators stood along roadsides for hours waiting for it to pass.

The torch run, scheduled to cover 2,800 miles in 26 days through 400 communities, is part of a celebration for the N.C. Olympic Festival to be held July 13-26.

Impatient children kept a close eye on the intersection of U.S. 401 and N.C. 217 where they would see the torch pass from Harnett County, almost two hours behind schedule, into Cumberland County.

Billy Wade, 31, of Harnett County passed the torch over the line to Bob Boeder, president of the Fayetteville Area Runners Association.

Deborah Miller of Fayetteville was watching when it happened.

"My wife is a fish for everything patriotic," her husband, Jack Miller, said.

Mrs. Miller took her husband and 3-year-old son to the county line at 10 a.m. and planned to follow the torch through Cumberland County.

"I've been out here for two hours, but it's worth the wait," she said.

Boeder said he enjoyed participating in the run. Boeder was accompanied by his two children for part of a designated mile run.

"I was looking foward to carrying it," Steve Boeder, 9, said.

His sister, 7-year-old Tisa, also was allowed to carry the torch part of the way.

About 150 volunteers carried the torch in Cumberland County, Tony Britt, a U.S. Olympic Festival representative, said.

Fayetteville Mayor Bill Hurley was one of the volunteer runners. He carried the torch around the Market House in downtown Fayetteville, where the Olde Fayetteville Association sponsored a celebration. About 500 people greeted the the flame's arrival.

"It's quite an honor to be a part of this," Hurley said during the half-hour ceremony.

Some sadness mingled with the joy of the occasion, as the mayor asked for a moment of silence to remember five servicemen killed in Wednesday's crash of a C-130 transport plane at Fort Bragg.

The torch ceremony continued as the 82nd Airborne Division band played and the fitness bears,

The torch ceremony continued as the 82nd Airborne Division band played and the fitness bears, mascots for the Festival, entertained onlookers.

A Festival representative presented Hurley with a souvenir torch.

Phil Clark, a catcher for the Fayetteville Generals baseball team, was the next to take the torch, sharing the honor with Samantha Fetters, Miss Fayetteville Dogwood, as the runners left the ceremony for Lumberton.

Jon Jordan, 26, from East Carolina University and

See TORCH, Page 2-B