

APPENDIX A: Cryptologists of World War I

From the Ground Up: American Cryptology during World War I

By Betsy Rohaly Smoot

The names of the individual soldiers at the bottom of the G2 structure who furnished the proof that the German divisions were still in their trenches are lost to history. Probably none of them understood, or ever will know, what part he played in the victory.

Time will not dim the glory of their deeds.

The human factor—the elusive “right stuff” in abilities, background, and personality—played a role in the selection of personnel for American cryptologic work during World War I. These people have been mostly anonymous to us, and we know very little about many of them except for some basic details of their birth and death. Few of the hundreds wrote of their experience and few were remembered in print by others. Approximately 650 men would serve with the American Expeditionary Forces (AEF) in cryptologic positions; about 450 men (and women) would serve in such positions in the United States. These workers came from across the United States—academics, lawyers, businessmen, clerks, engineers, telegraphers, and others. They were old and young, coming from well-established careers and just starting out in life. Some of the men recruited for the technical work of signal collection were already serving in the army or were in the Signal Corps reserve, but far more were working in the commercial telephone and telegraph industry.

Radio was the “cyber” of 1917. The technology was new, and amateur radio buffs were the smart young (and not so young) geeks of that time. Skills in radio and all other modes of telecommunications—the older telegraphy and the middle-aged telephony—were needed, as were engineers and mechanically inclined men of all sorts (and sometimes women). So great was the need for skilled radio operators that in some cases the fact that a man was slightly under the required weight was overlooked. The net was cast far and wide. Based on very rough calculations from 1910 census data, fewer than 4 percent of the United States’ 30 million working men were in occupations that were the logical pool for cryptologic talent—engineers, telegraphers, telephone workers, lawyers, teachers, stenographers, and typists. These numbers were likely slightly higher by 1917. Interestingly, in 1910 the word “radio” does not appear in any occupational category.² These skills would be needed throughout the US military—the US Army Signal Corps and the US Navy took whole groups of “Marconi men” and Bell Telephone workers to fill signal battalions and companies. Those working intelligence collection would find themselves in fully equipped but very primitive facilities that could be moved from site to site.

Cryptology was almost entirely a white male world during the war, as was the pool of individuals in the academic and technical fields from which these organizations found their recruits. The need for language skills, particularly for those who could understand and write German, meant that some skill fields contained many children and grandchildren of European immigrants who learned the language at home, in addition to those who had studied European languages academically. While 20 percent of the soldiers in the AEF were born overseas, the number of foreign-born cryptologists in the AEF seems to have been substantially lower, probably because of security concerns. Sixty of the 947 individuals (6.3 percent) listed in this appendix are known to have been born overseas; a few of those were born to American citizens living abroad. In the Radio Section, where German speakers were actively recruited, at least 38 of the 483 men (7.8 percent) are known to have been born outside the United States, less than 10 percent of the total.

A small group of Native Americans played a part in increasing communications security toward the end of the war, presaging the use of Native American codetalking in the Second World War. These men were not trained in cryptology and were not part of the broader national system. See chapter 16 for an in-depth discussion of their work. My research has uncovered the previously unknown fact that there were three individuals of Native American descent (3.8 percent of the 79 assigned personnel) working in the AEF G2A6 breaking codes and ciphers. Gilbert W. Daney, a registered member of the Choctaw Tribe, whose draft card indicated his race as white, served as an army field clerk from March to December 1918. Corporal Joseph Thunder, who served in the G2A6 from July through December 1918, was probably one of the three Oglala Sioux of that name who served in the AEF; however, there is not enough information to positively identify him. And Nazard M. Coursolle, who served in the office in May and June 1918 before transferring to the AEF Adjutant General's office, was part Mdawakanton (Dakota) Sioux.³

An equally small group of women was engaged in cryptologic work on the home front. While the British allowed women to enlist and play a cryptologic role in France, the United States did not. These women, however, had a disproportionately successful role in some areas at home. See chapter 17 for details about their work. At least 12 women worked as cryptanalysts in MI-8, and 5 women at Riverbank did analysis on material provided by the government.

No African Americans have, to date, been identified in any official government cryptologic pursuit during World War I. The only Black signal unit during the war was the 325th Field Signal Battalion of the 92nd Division, which arrived in France in June 1918. This unit was not tasked with radio intercept but, like other signal units at the front, may have inadvertently intercepted German communications. Any intercept by this unit would have gone to the division's intelligence officer; if such intercept exists it has not been found and did not make its way to the AEF G2A6 in Chaumont.⁴ Similarly, no Asian Americans have been identified in the workforce of 1917-1918. World War I draft cards provide broad racial identification and birthplace but do not allow easy categorization of other demographic data. It was beyond the scope of this book to examine all extant military personnel records for all individuals listed in this appendix.

Conclusion

After the war, there was little need to collect radio communications; codebreaking flourished against diplomatic cable traffic that was intercepted by the major telegraph companies with no technical collection effort on the part of the cryptologists. Some of the men and women who worked in MI-8 or in the AEF went to work for Herbert O. Yardley's Black Chamber. The tools and techniques needed to intercept radio signals were not entirely forgotten, but the skill set needed to exploit these communications was generally not sought out until the mid-1930s. Only four veterans of AEF cryptology would go on to serve in the army cryptologic service of WWII, for even the very youngest cryptologists of WWI would have been well into a second civilian career by 1941. The few that were still involved in cryptology in the Second World War had maintained some sort of connection with the work in the interwar years. Most of the World War I cryptologists went back to their lives and built careers—some in telecommunications, but others were writers, artists, lawyers, businessmen, and farmers. A few stayed in the military or the reserves, and some were recalled to duty in World War II in noncryptologic work.

Those who worked in cryptology during World War II also came from a wide range of occupations, including mathematicians with advanced degrees, missionaries with language skills, professors and other scholars. Unlike World War I, there were many, many, more women working in cryptology on the home front and overseas. Overseas, the Signal Corps continued to rely on engineers and those who had worked for telephone and telegraph companies.⁵ After World War II, there would be an increased emphasis on hiring those with academic and scientific credentials.

There is debate as to whether cryptologists are born with the innate ability to do the work, or whether people can be trained to accomplish the task. What is clear is that many of the World War I American cryptologists shared some characteristics. Many were more educated than the average American soldier. Quite a few of those selected for cryptologic work had capability in one or more languages other than English. Those involved with signal collection, if not completely familiar with all the technical details of the communications technologies of the day, understood the basics. Most of these men had a degree of maturity that led to their being trusted to operate somewhat independently. They were the cyber warriors of their day, and they had the right stuff to get the job done.

This Appendix provides a list of all the individuals who have been identified (as of December 2021) as working in American cryptology during the war. I developed this list from a variety of sources. Rosters of most (but not all) of the cryptologic organizations can be found in archival sources; at their best (e.g., a postwar list for the AEF Signal Corps Radio Section) they contain name, rank, date of arrival in France, and hometown. The historical records of several organizations (e.g., MI-8 and the US Navy Code and Signal Section) contain no lists at all. I used the extant rosters and other archival materials found in the National Archives to develop a base list of names, and then I conducted hundreds of hours of research into these individuals using publicly available genealogical and newspaper databases. Some individuals were easy to identify, but others' records were elusive. Every effort has been made to supply accurate information; birth and death information has not been listed unless I was able to make a connection between this information and evidence of cryptologic service. Where it was not possible to precisely identify an individual (most commonly because there were many of the same name, and organizational records do not provide enough information), only the name and rank (and hometown if given in an official roster) have been provided; these are indicated by an asterisk. The rank information should be treated with care, as many men remained in the reserves or active service and were promoted to higher rank after the war, or they returned to service in World War II. While this has been noted within the sections for each organization, I must emphasize that this list is incomplete. Any errors in identification are my own. I hope to be able to share the wealth of fascinating stories and career-related information I have gathered on many of these individuals in another venue in the future.

Approximately 1,171 people worked in cryptology during World War I with the following breakdown (personnel who were in more than one organization are counted only once, in their primary organization).

Table 1. Numbers of American World War I personnel, by organization

Organization	Total personnel (estimated)
	Names known	Names unknown	Known but counted in another organization
Riverbank Laboratories staff	6	0	1
Riverbank Laboratories trainees	72	0	9
MI-8 staff	74	At least 105	0
MI-8 trainees	4	There may be others	19
MI-10E	85	As many as 55	0
Navy Code and Cipher Section	7	56	0
Navy radio station at Otter Cliffs, Maine	62	There may be others	0
AEF G2A6	79	0	0

AEF Code Compilation Section	9	There may be others	0
AEF Radio Section	483	0	0
Various AEF Signal Corps units assisting the Radio Section	31	8	0
Native American codetalkers	35	There may be others	0
Subtotals	947	224	n/a
ESTIMATED TOTAL	1,171

For the purpose of this book, everyone who worked in a cryptologic organization or trained in cryptology is counted as a cryptologist. The lists in this appendix are incomplete for many organizations due to lack of information in the organization's records; 80.8 percent (947) of the estimated 1,171 cryptologists are named here.

Of the 947 names, 850 can be positively identified with biographical detail, or nearly 90 percent. This means we have at least some information on 72.75 percent of all World War I cryptologists. The search continues.

The tables use the following conventions:

- Full names are provided when known, though the text of the book may only give a middle initial. The names given reflect the name the individual is listed under in official military records. Where this name differs from the birth name, the other name(s) are given in parentheses.

- The FINAL RANK column reflects the last known rank of the individual during his or her World War I service. For those who stayed in the service or rejoined a service during World War II, that information appears in the COMMENT field. In most cases, these tables are service specific. The exception is the MI-8 Full-Time staff table, where the service is noted when known. All ranks are spelled out where known.
- If an individual is known to hold a PhD, the title Dr. appears with his or her name. Social titles (Mrs., Miss, Mr.) are only provided where they appear in official records.
- Place name spellings have been corrected from those that appear in official records; if the location is now in a different country than when the individual was born, that is noted. If a foreign place name could not be resolved, I have defaulted to the country alone.
- Individuals who have only a name and rank (and very occasionally a birthplace without a birthdate) are considered to be incomplete records and are marked with an asterisk.

Ed. note: Relatives and those with updates to this information are urged to contact the author care of the Center for Cryptologic History (via history@nsa.gov or CCH, 9800 Savage Road, Suite 6886, Fort Meade, MD 20755) to participate in efforts to further memorialize these cryptologists. The author has more details available on some of these individuals.

APPENDIX A Tables

APPENDIX A1: Riverbank Laboratories Full-Time Staff

George Fabyan's Riverbank Laboratories in Geneva, Illinois contained a cipher department that assisted the US government in the early months of World War I. This table includes only those staff known to have worked on code and cipher material sent to Riverbank Laboratories by the Military Intelligence Division. There were other staff at Riverbank who worked on the Baconian ciphers, but it cannot be confirmed that they also did wartime work.

Riverbank Trainees

William and Elizabeth Friedman taught two cipher classes at Riverbank Laboratories for the US Army. The first, consisting of four students selected by the Military Intelligence Division in Washington, took place in late November 1917; these students were immediately sent to the American Expeditionary Forces' G2A6 and became the heart of that organization. The second, larger, class began in February 1918 and continued through March, though not all students were present for the entire period. These students were supplied by individual army divisions; only a few of these men exhibited aptitude for the work and the majority did not work in cryptology during the war.

APPENDIX A2: Military Intelligence Division (Appendix includes both MI-8 and MI-10E)

MI-8 Full-Time Staff

The Army's Military Intelligence Division's Code and Cipher Section, MI-8 was established in May 1917. There is no complete roster of MI-8 full-time staff, which probably numbered about 180 people by the end of the war. This list has been reconstructed from a variety of sources and does not include trainees or temporary consultants. The people on this list represent all of the sections of the organization, not just those who broke codes and ciphers, and may include some clerical personnel.

MI-8 Trainees

MI-8 provided code and cipher training for U.S. Army officers identified for service in the AEF in both France and Siberia and also those going to attaché positions. While this list is likely incomplete, all the G2A6 personnel who trained with MI-8 are included.

MI-10E

MI-10E, the Military Intelligence Division's Radio Intelligence Section, was established to collect and analyze radio signals from sites in the United States both along the US-Mexico border and in Maine. It had an authorized strength of 140, and 100 men were on duty at the time of the Armistice. This list is incomplete. The organization continued to operate and recruit new personnel until the early 1920s. While every effort has been made to limit the list to those on duty before the November 1918 Armistice, it is possible that some of these men arrived after that time.

APPENDIX A3: NAVY

Navy Code and Signal Section

The Navy Code and Signal Section performed some cryptanalytic work in 1917 and early 1918 before cooperating with the Army's MI-8 in mid-1918. Very little is known about the staff of this organization. In addition to the seven names below, there were at least two lieutenants, six lieutenant junior grades, at least 12 yeoman, as many as 35 yeomanettes, and two mess attendants, for a total of at least 63 people.

Navy Radio Station at Otter Cliffs

The Naval Radio Station at Otter Cliffs, Maine was both a communications station for the Navy and an intercept site. This table has been reconstructed from a list of those present at Christmastime in 1920. The COMMENT field indicates the men who were at the station when it opened in 1917. An effort has been made to only include men who arrived before the Armistice where this can be determined. This list is likely incomplete.

Additional Signal Corps Units

The AEF Signal Corps Radio Section did not achieve full personnel strength until late 1918. Other AEF Signal Corps units provided personnel to the Radio Section to conduct necessary signal intercept tasks in late 1917 and early 1918. The units listed below are those known and documented to have provided personnel to augment early Radio Section efforts.

406th Telegraph Battalion

The 406th Telegraph Battalion was one of the twelve battalions organized in the Spring of 1917 by Bell Telephone. Company D comprised employees of the Philadelphia and Harrisburg divisions of the Bell Company and Company E was made up of employees from the Pittsburgh division. The battalion was part of the AEF Signal Corps and after August 1918 subordinate to the First Army's I Corps.

APPENDIX A7: Native American Codetalkers

The employment of Native Americans to serve as “codetalkers” was an unplanned, impromptu effort to provide better communication security for combat troops using telephones. Recent scholarship has expanded our knowledge of this effort but it seems likely that we do not know all the names of those who participated in codetalking during World War I.
