

Texas Towers

Post-World War II technology permitted lighthouses to be built at locations previously served by lightships. These offshore light structures were based upon technology developed in the oil industry. Their legs are driven 170 feet into the seabed.

The towers were designed to withstand 65-foot seas and 125 miles per hour winds. Seven towers were built and all have either been removed from service and dismantled or sold.